Education

- The University of Alabama, B.S., Economics, 1986

Bill Stiers handles complex federal legislative and political matters for publicly-traded and privately-held corporations and emerging businesses of all sizes. He regularly advises and represents general counsel, executives, and board members. For the past 30 years Bill has worked directly with senators, members of Congress, Administration officials, and foreign governments, helping shape legislation and policy on behalf of his clients. Over his career he has worked with nearly every federal department and agency, as well as every Congressional Committee. He is the managing director of Balch's Washington, D.C. office and chairs the firm's political action committee.

Q&A

- What type of matters of you work on most often?

Matters involving change to government rules and regulations, as well as government funding.

- What previous experiences, prior to your work at Balch, influence your practice?

Directing legislation on Capitol Hill provided me insight into how to work the Federal process effectively and efficiently. Working for a political advertising and public relations firm gave me an understanding of grassroots and grasstops political campaigns. Managing a political fundraising company taught me the intricacies of compliance and transparency.

- What do you see on the horizon in your area of practice?

The world gets smaller and faster every day, and every size company is connected in some way to foreign trade - goods, services, and information. International government relations work expands every year and we expect it to accelerate exponentially in the years to come.
